Treatment of Skin Cancers. --Continued THE SELECTIVE CAUSTICS. Two agents only deserve mention under this heading; but one of them is the best treatment of all, and the one that I commonly employ. Pyrogallic acid, first recommended by Jarisch and Kaposi, has been quite extensively employed in the treatment of rodent ulcer and superficial epithelioma, and with a considerable amount of success. It is claimed that it is a painless caustic; and it certainly is practically painless; but there is a good deal of difference of opinion as to its value as an escharotic. It is certainly a very feeble one, and probably a very uncertain one also. It is very slow in its action, requiring to be applied for from ten days to three weeks for satisfactory results; and it frequently has to be reapplied a second or third time. Pyrogallol...
