Nothing was accomplished at the Observatory during this year. And in the spring, when the Lake Survey made signals of their time to him, by telegraph, for the purpose of determining the longitude, he failed to make the requisite observations for the correction of his time, and they were compelled to wait some two or three weeks for the reductions. The year was spent by him in building operations, in life insurance agencies, in buying tax warrants, and in other speculations. I had a free and kind conversation with him on the subject, in which I urged him to desist, warned liim that he would involve himself, and advised him to devote himself to his proper pursuits. He replied, that he was bound to make money. I reminded him that all he had gained had been through science; and begged him to have confidence, that if he were faithful to science, science would take care of him. He replied, that he could do both. As an instance of his successful speculations, he mentioned that he had bought a watch, and sold it again at a large advance. He soon became deeply involved, and lost his credit, as I had predicted. When he heard that Dr. Brunnow was about to return, he expressed to me his disappointment, on the ground that it would impair his interests. I told him to banish all such feelings, and represented to him how his true...
