Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: .All men connected with passenger trains should be qualified, not only from the standpoint of humanity, because of the relief which they may afford to injured passengers, but from the standpoint of the interest of their railway company, since prompt attention to injured passengers may prevent aggravation of injuries and possibly increased claims for damages. Both of these classes of men should be taught not only the application of First Aid, but should be instructed in the organization of First Aid parties in extensive accidents and in the best methods of showing others how to apply it. All other employes should be taught the subject in a less complete manner, perhaps, although in view of the changes which transfers and promotions may make, it would be well enough for them all to receive the same amount of training. I am prepared to assert, and that with...
