The subsoil here is light brown or grayish brown. It is not so compact as that of the typical Ramona loam and contains many lime nodules. The area covered by this variation is less than one-half square mile in extent. If this soil were more extensive it would be classified with the Antioch series encountered in the soil survey of the Riverside area and elsewhere in the State. Other areas with concentrations of lime in the subsoil were encountered in a few places. They usually lie next to areas of sedimentary rocks or near breaks in topography. Except for color, texture, and lime content of the subsoil, this variation closely resembles the typical Ramona loam. The Ramona loam is one of the most extensive and important agricultural types in the Los Angeles area. It occurs in the region east and west of Los Angeles, south of Whittier, between Inglewood and Long Beach, north and northwest of Wilmington, in minor areas northeast of Los Angeles, and elsewhere in areas of old valley-filling soils. It occupies old alluvial fans, foot slopes, marine terraces, and elevated mesalike areas. It has a gently sloping or undulating to rolling and dissected surface. Eighty per cent or more of the type has a smooth and uniform surface, except for minor drainageways, which have rounded sides and bottoms. The type generally lies at higher elevations than associated recent-alluvial soils, and is either undergoing erosion or is being covered by more...
