CHAPTER IV THE TWO WAYS OF BEING CROST IN LOVE I could not love thee, dear, so much, Loved I not honor more. -- Lovelace. AND what all this while has become of the fair breaker of so many hearts, to whom I have not yet even introduced my readers She was sitting in the little farm-house beside the mill, buried in the green depths of the valley of Combe, half-way between Stow and Chapel, sulking as much as her sweet nature would let her, at being thus shut out from all the grand doings at Bideford, and forced to keep a Martinmas Lent in that far western glen. So lonely was she, in fact, that though she regarded Eustace Leigh with somewhat of aversion, and (being a good Protestant) with a great deal of suspicion, she could not find it in her heart to avoid a chat with him whenever he came down to the farm and to its mill, which he contrived to do, on I know not what would-be errand, almost every day. Her uncle and aunt at first looked stiff enough at these visits, and the latter took care always to make a third in every conversation; but still Mr. Leigh was a gentlemans son, and it would not do to be rude to a neighboring squire and a good customer; and Rose was the rich mans daughter and they poor cousins, so it would not do either to quarrel...
