Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1877 edition. Excerpt: . . . is thick and strong, and there is a moderate throatiness; shoulders are broad and sloping, and very muscular; the loin arched and lithesome; the chest broad and very near the ground; forelegs muscular and bony, and crooked--the knees turned in, so that the ankles nearly meet (if the elbows are out, it shows the dog has been tampered with); the feet large, muscular, and well turned out, and with strong black nails; thighs extremely well developed; the skin is loose enough to hold two dogs instead of one; the coat should be short and fine, close, and satiny; the tail is somewhat houndy, it is carried rather low, and has a sort of pothook bend at the end of it. The colour is of least importance; they are generally either fallowred, black-and-tan, or liver-and-tan. There is also a larger breed of Dachshund, used principally for hunting deer; they often stand 12 inches or more at the shoulder, but must be proportionately long. The first-prize dog at Baden in 1875 was, I believe, between 13 and 14 inches high. The engraving on page 103 is that of two French Bassets, a breed of dogs well known in France, but not at all common in this country. CHAPTER X. The Why And The Wherefore Of Given Points. When I was a little urchin of a schoolboy, I think I knew the Shorter Catechism as well as any youngster of my years; and I knew all the...
